ing delights, Jenkins proposes to furnish the world with a description of "Morning Receptions by the Ladies of our Secretaries;" but, first, he indulges in a rapturous panegyric on society in Washington. Hear him:

It may be well doubted if there is another city under the sun where politics and society so frequently blend in harmony as in our national capital. Life here is a national kaleidescope, in which the fragmentary parts revolve in the order of accident, but which revolving as they may, present both regular and agreeable objects to the beholder. I have thought politics and society stole upon a stranger here like pictures in dissolving views. When the columns which support the dome of State are just bursting into well-defined outline and symmetry, the fair syren, with her many-hued draperies, flaunts into the illusory picture with radiant beauties, until the mutable tracery of politics is lost in obscurtty.

Society is a charming goddess-her empire is universal and her sovereignty undisputed .-Though her votaries are legion, and tame, wealth and talents are conspicuous proteges, still, in all lands and among all kindreds, woman, adorned by refinement and intellect, is the

After this incomparably elequent outburst of admiration, Jenkins proceeds to give a circumstantial narrative of "morning receptions by the ladies of our Secretaries.'

The adventures which he details are represented to have occured the 21st of January, 1858. At 1 o'clock he sallied forth "under the agreeable escort of my friends the Misses G-, of - street," and his first | the business season sets in pause was at the door of the Secretary of the following "impressions:"

Mrs. Thompson receives with great elegance of manner, and excited the admiration of our party. As it is the custom of those ladies of our Secretaries to have one or more unmarried lady who is usually a near friend or relative, to share the honor and the labors of entertaining, we were delighted to meet Miss Wiley, and to accord our humble compliments in praise of her unaffected grace. The lady who speaks of "the noble men of New York" is worthy to dispense the honors of society under the favor of a Democratic Secretary.

Jenkins next bows into the Postmaster feels slightly uncomfortable, but is after-wards restored to his equilibrium by "the quick eye of high breeding" and a sight of the refreshment table. He must tell the story for himself:

Mrs. Gov. Brown very much interested me. When we arrived there were so many distinguished gentlemen and accomplished ladies surrounding her, that I began to feel that both my entree and exit would prove a very "French leave" affair; but with the quick eye of high breeding our party were espied, and the manner in which we were received put at ease with appropriate conversation and shown to the refreshment table, somewhat elevated my previous ideas of entertaining. Miss Saunders, who, I believe, is a niece of

Mrs. Brown, reflected the honors of this cordial The reception at the Secretary of State's is despatched in a brief but pregnant par-

Miss Cass received the honors at the mansion of our Premier. Her style, dress and conversation were of the chaste and classic order, altogether what you would naturally expect in the daughter of so eminent a statesman. In "the order of accident" Jenkins next did homage to the lady of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in her presence the impulse of his ardent nature warmed into a glow of intensest admiration. He exclaims: Mrs. Cobb is a generous representative of the "Empire State of the South." We always linger longest where the bland air and the sunshine greet us, and the half hour in which this eminently social lady and her friends, Miss Clayton and Mrs. Craig, carried me back to the sunny groves of Georgia, and a ten years' retrospection, left the most agreeable and enduring memories. It should be the pride of our nation that the ladies of our men high in political power can do so much by their high toned courtesies to keep the Union together. Improvident eulogist! For he exhausts the language of panegyric before he reaches the climax of admiration, and is then compelled to repeat compliments already appropriated or to vary the monotony of praise by ridiculous extravagance and inpertinent conceits. After such a satiety of adulation, what he writes of his visits to the ladies of the Attorney General, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, strikes us as absurd bombast or insipid common-

Mrs. Black and daughter have had their praises named so frequently it were the work of useless repetition to say one word of praise. On Saturday last I was presented to Miss Black, at the President's, and a lady so lovely and accomplished could have only attained these merits through a maternal gu dance so pure and elevated as I to-day learned to have been hers. The quiet style of dress, the intellectual and easy flow of conversation, the perfect ease with which all strangers met and mingled in the group that surrounded both Mrs. Black and daughter, placed, as it ever must upon the brow of a true American lady, the wreath of highest

Mrs. Toucey's was the last, but by no means least, among the pleasures of our social circuit. The lady of our gallant Secretary of the Navy wins honors with the visitors of this metropolis. The parties and entertainments given by Mrs. Toucey are among the mort recherche in

Jenkins completes the circle of Cabinet receptions, but even the ineffable graces of the ladies of our Secretaries fail to satisfy his thirsty soul. So he "tapers off" by a descent upon the unofficial residences of three private beauties: Having traversed the social heavens in the orbits of the seven stars of first magnitude, and there being yet an hour of Summer-like radiance glancing adown the broad and endless were attired in most comely contrast, and in the by after all, which gives position, and though we had run an ordeal of the most elevated characteristics, we found that, even as the last ray which in summer sunshine melts away itself nd gilds the receding hills with increasing glory, so did this call shed a halo of friendly admi-

The truth is, society in Washington is fast small and select class of quiet people one finds there scarcely a vestige of the republican simplicity of earlier times. Everything is sham and pretension. The profusion of paste and pinchbeck which dazzles the eye of Jenkins is as genuine as the air of courtly elegance which excites his enthusiasm. With the Spartan severity of manner that once distinguished the representative men of the country, have disappeared the unobtrusive but substantial character of its women. The change is sadly significant of national decay .-
